Excerpt:

Cara led me up a flagstone path that cut through a darkened garden. I swayed, feeling drunk and exhilarated and aroused all at the same time. The air was rose-scented, and I heard a softly burbling fountain somewhere in the distance. Cara stopped us in front of the enormous oaken door of a mansion. She put her hand on my chin and tipped my eyes to look deep into hers.

"Once we cross the threshold, there's no turning back," she said.

"Okay," I said, staring into her mahogany irises.

Cara kissed me. I edged my tongue into her mouth and ran the tip along her bottom row of teeth. Then her top row. A thrill shot down my body as it brushed against a sharp, pointed canine incisor.

"Wow," I breathed.

Cara smiled. There was no mistaking it this time. Two of her top teeth were unnaturally—supernaturally—long.

"You have fangs," I said dumbly.

"They're real." Cara sounded like she was used to people reacting like me.

I shuddered as she kissed my neck, suddenly aware of what she had behind those soft lips of hers. My limbs were leaden, and my blood pumped slow as wine and honey. All I could feel were her moist, ripe lips suckling gently at my neck, those slim fingers, the leg pushing up between my legs.

Somehow, she got me through the door and up a marble staircase. I got vague impressions of an unlit chandelier, oil paintings, an opulent wall tapestry, all artifacts of Cara's luxurious life, as she ushered me along with her hands. I followed after her, my lips leading the way. Then, there was carpet beneath my shoes, the soft click of a light switch, and I realized we were standing in a bedroom.

"Come here, come here," she whispered.
