The Grace and Duty of Being Spiritually Minded, Declared and Practically Improved (Classic Reprint) John Owen

He may therefore know, that the thoughts here communicated, were originally private meditations for my own use, in a season wherein I was every way unable to do any thing for the edification of others, and from expectation, that ever I should be so able any more in this world. Receiving, as I thought some benefit and satisfaction in the exercise of my own meditations therein, when God was graciously pleased to restore a little strength unto me, I insisted on the same subject, in the instruction of a private congregation; and this I did partly out of a sense of the advantage I had received myself by being conversant in them, and partly from an apprehension,, that the duties directed and pressed unto in the whole discourse, were seasonable from all sorts of present circumstances,, to be declared and urged on the minds and consciences of professors.
